JANA SCHRÖDER

b. 1983, Brilon, DE Lives and works in Düsseldorf, DE

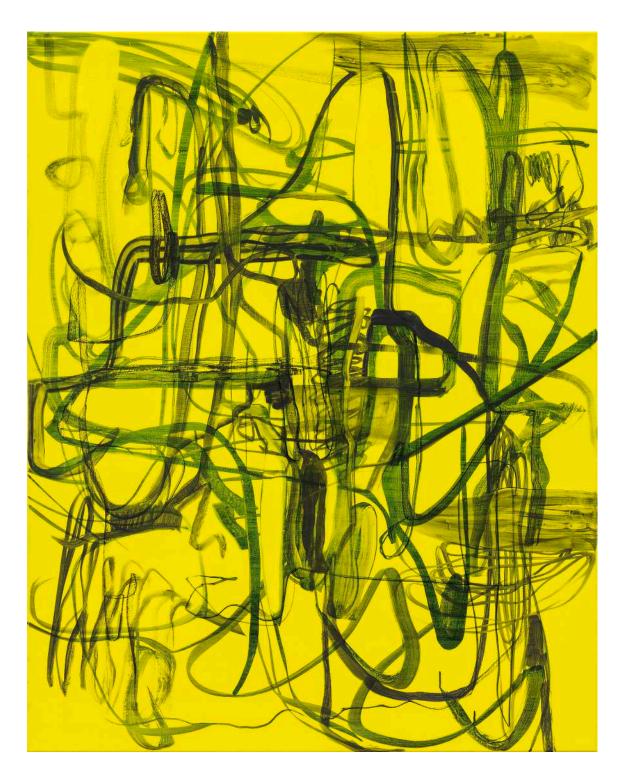

Schröder's practice is a meditation on process and repetition, slowness and speed. Her mazes of variously translucent and shaded coiling lines employ formal repetition to meditative effect. Furthermore, each series consists of a highly refined color palette, usually employing two or three shades. The slowness of her process characterized by experimental discovery also finds expression on her surfaces, which represent meticulously painted moments that might either be understood as negative space or positive shapes, depending on how one approaches the compositions. The deliberation of such moments is contrasted by sections of more frenzied, quickly-applied paint which register the trace of the artist's decisive hand at work.

Jana Schröder (b. 1983, Brilon, DE: lives and works in Düsseldorf. DE) studied at the Kunstakademie Düsseldorf in the class of Albert Oehlen. Since 2009, she has been the subject of numerous institutional solo and group exhibitions, including at: Aishti Foundation, Beirut; Bundeskunsthalle, Bonn; Gesellschaft für Gegenwartskunst, Augsburg; Kopfermann-Fuhrmann Stiftung, Düsseldorf: Deichtorhallen, Hamburg: Kunstmuseum Bonn: Kunstmuseum Wiesbaden; Kunstsammlungen Chemnitz; Kunstverein Heppenheim; Kunstverein Reutlingen; Pinakothek der Moderne, Munich; Sammlung Grässlin, St. Georgen; Sankt Peter, Cologne; and the Yves Klein Archives, Paris. Gallery presentations include: Skarstedt Gallery, Paris; Galerie Bärbel Grässlin, Frankfurt am Main; Nino Mier Gallery, Los Angeles, Brussels and New York; and T293, Rome. Her work is part of the public collections of the Aïshti Foundation, Beirut; Friedrichs Foundation, Bonn / Weidingen; and Miettinen Collection, Helsinki / Berlin.

2023 NINO MIER GALLERY NEW YORK, NY, US

Nino Mier Gallery is thrilled to announce an exhibition of new acrylic paintings by Düsseldorf-based painter Jana Schröder. PERLASYNTHICS marks both Schröder's New York-debut as well as the grand opening of Nino Mier's first space in the city. The exhibition will be on view from January 28 to February 25, 2023, at 62 Crosby St in SoHo, with an opening reception from 6-8pm on Saturday, January 28.

Developed in 2022, PERLASYNTHICS is Schröder's most emotive and pictorially riotous body of work yet. Schröder agitates her surfaces with a variety of marks: long lines containing intervals of deep saturation; closed, translucent forms; and seemingly unconscious scribbles, a hallmark of her practice for years. Schröder fills in some sections of her coiling linework to create irregular shapes, leaving others as empty, white voids that evoke figure-ground dynamics.

The works were all conceived on a three-part rubric: first, an investigation of the tugof-war between form and its lack; second, a durational constraint posed by fast-drying acrylic; and third, a uniquely expanded color palette. While Schröder's previous series have largely been restricted to dual-toned palettes, her most recent ones leave no major color unused, evoking a lively, almost musical dissonance. In the spirit of Josef Albers, color is both form and content, means and end.

In moving to acrylic for this series, the artist grappled with a new set of physical constraints posed by the quick-drying nature of the paint, executing the entire body of work on the floor for the first time.

Collapsing the categorical divide between action and object, PERLASYNTHICS follows a lineage of artists such as Helen Frankenthaler and Sonia Gechtoff to prioritize the gestural power of painting. For Schröder, painting is the medium best suited to register the motions and emotions of the artist and unmoor those of the beholder. PERLASYNTHICS is a meditation on painting's physicality, both in terms of the creative process, and of a painting's power to move through and affect a viewer.

Like footprints on a snowy path, each mark on the canvas registers the artist's body at work. Schröder's painting possesses a kind of performative corporeality, closing the distance between the act of painting and the act of seeing and creating a palpable intimacy between the viewer and the artist.

RUDDYSYNC ILILAC

2022 NINO MIER GALLERY LOS ANGELES, CA, US

Nino Mier Gallery is pleased to present RUDDYSYNC ILILAC, Schröder's fifth solo exhibition with the gallery. Eleven new paintings will be on view in Los Angeles from June 4 – July 9, 2022.

Ruddysync Ililac is a neologism comprised of "Ruddy Iilac" and "Synchronisation". It refers to the two colors that dominate Schröder's new canvas works: English red and purple. When conceiving this new suite of works, the artist was compelled by the ideas of tonal discordance and un-photographability. She began by working with the color English red, exploring its extremity and aggression. According to Schröder, the color "destroys every painting because once it is on your paintbrush, English red heavily soils all other colors that touch it." As viewers, we can appreciate its deep richness, but for painters, it is an aggressive color that asserts itself on all others that come into contact with it. In RUDDYSYNC ILILAC, she marries it to "the nasty, lightened lavender," noting that both colors are almost impossible to photograph accurately. Through her understanding and use of English red as a color which resists all other colors, and her deployments of a color palette resistant to digital reproduction, Schröder has produced her most defiant body of work yet.

Schröder is known for a practice grounded in irreducible and frenetic painting techniques. A devoted formalist, she produces paintings which are largely governed by the action of the paint itself, resulting in webs of languid, curling brushstrokes that guide viewers' roving eyes. Looping brushstrokes contain subtle variations in saturation, producing an effect of depth, like a many-layered web that advances towards and recedes from the viewer. Executed in large scales, with the eye of a meticulous colorist and a keen sense for composition, Schröder's works recall both the moving, intuitive body and the still, conceptual mind.

Schröder's practice is a meditation on process and repetition, slowness and speed. Her jostling maze of variously translucent and shaded coiling lines employ formal repetition to meditative effect. Furthermore, she repeated experiments with English red and lilac while conceiving the series, testing out the colors in many different canvas sizes. The slowness of her process characterized by experimental discovery also finds expression on her surfaces, which represent meticulously painted moments that might either be understood as negative space or positive shapes, depending on how one approaches the compositions. The deliberation of such moments is contrasted by sections of more frenzied, quickly-applied paint which register the trace of the artist's decisive hand at work.

As much as RUDDYSYNC ILILAC is a formal meditation on color, depth, line, and speed, it also cultivates a potent carnality which impresses upon viewers. Perhaps some of the aggression Schröder attributes to the color English red might be due to its status as the color of raw meat, of blood, of flushed skin. Schröder's cool-toned lilac forms a stark contrast to the voracity and vivacity of English red as applied by the artist, as though it were a lifeless body waiting to be animated by a most exquisite force.

2021 NINO MIER GALLERY BRUSSELS, BE

Mother dear, she already knows Mother dear, she'll never let me go Mother dear, kept me warm and safe Mother dear, I'll never lose my faith in Mother dear The Divine Comedy, Mother dear, 2006

Nino Mier Gallery is thrilled to announce its first solo exhibition of German artist Jana Schröder in the Brussels location. It will be on view from March 11 to April 10, 2021.

Contemplating her exhibition, Jana Schröder confessed: »If I was a singer, this would definitely be my most personal album«. No wonder, given alone the show's title— MOTHER. After a year of social distortion and emergency, she gave in to her desire for "proper" paintings and works on paper. Knowing full well of all clichés, stereotypes and attributions, undoubtedly evoked by any »motherly sentiment«. Obviously, something was amiss, she cravingly longed for.

Now, alternating on each floor, red and almost carnal paintings as well as clear blue drawings are intricately intertwined throughout the gallery. Schröder employs red and blue not only as complementary contrasts. She rather lets them act out the full range of associations and emotions. For their relation is far more than antithetical, like a one-dimensional distinction between warm and cold. Both colours, though opposites, share certain qualities.

The lush and swaying reds are just as caring as they are alluring. The sharp blues are simultaneously rigid and soothing. Their paradoxical bond reaches even further, as the red's warm embrace can be found in decisively resolute paintings and the cool and edgy drawings instantly blossom into an open tenderness.

But it doesn't end there. Schröder fundamentally challenges all painterly means and conventions. Everything at her disposal—colours, backgrounds and foregrounds, spontaneous gestures, lapses of memory, calculated marks, alleged rules, social roles, even her own motherhood—blends into each other and inseparably becomes one.

And in case, you are now wondering, what to make out of all this, as Neil Hannon said: "Mother dear, she already knows"  $\dots$

With the artist Jana Schröder, the Kopfermann-Fuhrmann Foundation is continuing its exhibition series, which presents painterly positions in solo exhibitions at random. What they all have in common is an outstanding idea of abstract painting in the 21st century.

Jana Schröder outlines the painterly position between drawing and painted image in large abstract compositions.

Duly Noted: 5 New York Shows I Already Love This Year

By Jacoba Ulrist

As a contemporary art journalist, I'm always asked two questions: "what should I see this weekend?" and "what should I buy?" The good news first: the art world has never been bigger or more dynamic. According to the 2022 Art Basel and UBS Global Art Market Report, sales are already outperforming the year before the pandemic. New York's TriBeCa, gathering steam as a significant arts district since the fall of 2019, has experienced an explosion post-shutdown, giving Chelsea a bona fide run for its money. Speaking of competition, the specter of Los Angeles as the country's cultural epicenter certainly looms. While in the Hamptons, Hauser & Wirth has reverted to a seasonal schedule and Phillips has abandoned Southampton. At the same time, Palm Beach continues to blossom as an ecosystem with sustained programming from the likes of Lehmann Maupin, Pace, and Gavlak Gallery. The bad news? There's a deluge of emerging names and top-notch spaces—with no sign of slowing, especially from the smaller, sexier galleries. Yet we still have the same amount of time on our calendar, perhaps even less with a booming fair circuit that vies for attention.

Enter: Duly Noted. Join me the last Thursday of each month as I cut through the noise to tell you about the most important art shows and why you can't miss them. This week we begin in my home turf—no dethroning New York as the white-hot, nucleus just yet—but throughout the year, I'll be coming to you from Los Angeles, Mexico City, Paris, and beyond with concise reporting and reviews. My goal is to keep Duly Noted always about the artists by highlighting the painters and sculptors that will define the decade ahead and dominate buyer's wishlists. By pushing their medium to new heights, each artist reminds us of Covid's enduring truth: there's no substitute for experiencing art in real life.

JANA SCHRODER II NINO MIER GALLERY

Welcome to New York: I've Been Waiting for You

Jana Schröder's roaring, frenetic compositions have been lodged in my psyche since Nino Mier's spectacular group exhibition last summer, "Painters Paint Paintings: LA Version," curated by art advisor Alexander Warhus. Luckily, us New Yorkers will now have a Schröder all our own. I'm so looking forward to "PERLASYNTHICS," which showcases her large masterpieces in the artist's signature, saturated lexicon of scribbles and curling brushwork. The body of work will be rendered in fast-drying acrylic for the first time, and with a broader color range than ever before. Based in Düsseldorf, Schröder's moment has come, and once you know her work it's unmistakable. Meanwhile, Nino is an LA fixture, preceded by five spaces in his hometown, one in Marfa, Texas and two in Brussels. Take note: with a deep roster of European artists, he is unveiling his 4,500 square-foot ground floor SoHo space this weekend. I'll see you there.

A Naples Exhibition Brings Together Works by Three Generations of Artists

By ArtNet Staff

What To Know:

Curated by art historian and writer Christian Malycha, "Accesso" at Naples Alfonso Artiaco gallery brings together works by three generations of German artists, namely André Butzer, Albert Oehlen, David Schutter, Jana Schröder, Raphaela Simon, and Ulrich Wulff. The exhibition is essentially broken into six solo exhibitions, and the artists have arranged their works within individual rooms in the gallery. Passing from the expressive freedom of Albert Oehlen's works through to the contemporary visions of Jana Schröder and Raphaela Simon, the exhibition offers an open conversation about shifting artistic approaches across generations.

Why We Like It:

The exhibition is rooted in the belief that artworks allow us to better access ourselves (whether we like it or not) and that each artist in their own way presents a space questioning the ways in which we perceive the world. In Oehlen's Ö'Norm, the artist presents a fragmented space whose pictorial elements hover together tenuously, as planes and gestures blur into one another. In the work of André Butzer, on the other hand, color, line, subject operate together, seemingly inseparably. Jana Schröder's works are experiments in visual accumulation—coming from a scriptural and calligraphic tradition, the artist creates an excess of painterly gestures that stop any literal legibility—text becomes a kind of texture. What these varied approaches share in common is a desire to challenge the viewer to look deeper and more intentionally.

What the Gallery Says:

"Works of art—be it a painting, a watercolor or a drawing—are peculiar things. They offer, to quote the late Umberto Eco, 'l'accesso al proprio cuore'— immediate access to one's own heart. They allow for immediate access to the heart of an artist as well as to our own hearts. No matter the temperaments, they are there, if we agree with them or not. Sometimes, the artwork causing us the biggest headache might eventually even be the one to help us see the clearest and come to terms with our longings, experiences, and our lives."

Highlights from the 2021 Armory Show's VIP Preview

By Jacoba Ulrist

For many, The Armory Show's 2020 VIP preview marked the last moment of normal before the world paused: in a heartbeat, museums and galleries shuttered, art fairs postponed, then cancelled, and dealers rushed to sophisticated virtual platforms. But Thursday morning saw the official emergence from this long hibernation, as the first major American fair returned with VIP hours and fresh September dates at the sprawling Javits Center.

On the one hand, a subdued reality still hangs in the air. Careful pandemic protocols are in place; artists, collectors, and gallery staff are masked throughout the 54,000-square-foot venue. Yet despite lingering uncertainty, the day pulsed with the familiar vitality of the Armory Show, a singularly New York art fair that has a tradition of including younger, exciting galleries, many with lesser known, solo artist booths, alongside traditional blockbuster names and topical, curated presentations in the Focus section. This time, the Armory Show also embodies a singular resilience, launching a grand re-entry to art opening season in the country's enduring contemporary capital. As they say, never bet against New York City.

JANA SCHRÖDER I NINO MIER GALLERY:

Fairgoers rightly flocked to Dusseldorf-based Jana Schroder's solo presentation of large-scale arresting paintings that spans two of the artist's series, Neurosox and Specshift—both of which investigate the familiar gestures of handwriting, part of a diagrammatic aesthetic she's perfected throughout her practice. Schroder's process focuses on repetition, and harkens her professor, the modern master Albert Oehlen. Of her technique, Schroder has said she enjoys setting rules as much as breaking them.

Sharon Zoldan Shares her Six Artists to Watch from Miami

By WhiteWall Staff

Sharon Zoldan, the founder of international art consultancy firm , says she tends to source previews well in advance of the fairs to study up and tailor highlights for her clients.

For Zoldan last week in Miami, that meant focusing on three fairs: Art Basel in Miami Beach, UNTITLED, and . "As it becomes more competitive to buy at the emerging price-point, my advice is to go with your gut," she told Whitewall recently. "It also helps to go with an advisor who has the relationships in place to get you the best and the brightest work by leading emerging artists."

JANA SCHRÖDER I NINO MIER GALLERY:

Schröder was the only female student in respected abstract painter Albert Oehlen's final MFA class. There's definite lineage in the gesture, and yet her paintings somehow have a more feminine feel. Her brushwork is lyrical with notes of Twombly in the action and movement. "My favorite body of work is her Spontacts series, where she uses the last remnants of carbon-copy pencil in the world," Zoldan said. The medium has a very violet hue, which naturally fades to gray over time through exposure to sunlight. Zoldan also recently commissioned the artist to do a large-scale mural in the home of a client in Los Angeles. Zoldan affirms that the artist has both the appropriate pedigree and a unique voice that distinguishes her from contemporaries.

VOTE

By Maya Oehlen

VOTE bitch!

Die Ausstellung VOTE im Kunstverein Heppenheim zeigt die beiden Künstler*innen Andreas Breunig und Jana Schröder. Das von den beiden gewählte Konzept sieht einen Wettstreit vor, in dem die beiden gegeneinander antreten.

Warum sollte man die beiden eigentlich miteinander vergleichen? Da ist zunächst einmal der Fakt, dass die beiden verheiratet sind. Wer kennt nicht die Gedanken beim Anblick von Paaren: Wer sieht besser aus? Wer ist sympathischer? Was findet der/die an dem/der? Es ist nun mal so: der Mensch will vergleichen. Abgesehen davon sind die beiden aus derselben Generation, beide haben an der Kunstakademie in Düsseldorf studiert, machen abstrakte Malerei und haben seit Neuem auch einen Hund. Beppo ist ein Lagotto Romagnolo, eine der trendigsten Hunderassen momentan. Trotz all der Gemeinsamkeiten kann man ihre Kunst doch gut unterscheiden. Jana malt monochrome Abstraktionen in dünnem Blau, dickem Blau und auch Gelb, während Andreas' Umgang mit Farben uns vermuten lässt, dass er sie einfach von der Palette weg haben will. Da sie nicht in Kollaboration arbeiten, bietet es sich leicht an, ihre Kunst direkt zu vergleichen.

Durch so eine Gegenüberstellung folgt natürlich die Frage, welches das bessere Bild oder wer denn der/ die bessere Künstler*in ist. Das kann eine relevante Frage sein.Im Sport zum Beispiel kann dies ja auch objektiv beantwortet werden. (Serena und Venus Williams, die Herren Klitschko oder natürlich David und Victoria Beckham.) In der Kunst lenkt diese Frage jedoch oft vom Wesentlichen ab. Schließlich ist das bei zwei so easygeilen Künstlern Geschmackssache. Mit der Ausstellung VOTE kommen Jana und Andi genau diesem Aspekt zuvor. Wenn es eine*n eindeutige*n Gewinner*in gibt, kann man sich wieder voll auf die Arbeit konzentrieren. Life goes on, einfach mal Brokkoli roh essen.

Die Entscheidung ist den Ausstellungsbesuchern überlassen, die ihre Meinung auf dem Voting Slip hinterlassen können. Dieses Konzept wurde schon vor acht Jahren in der GSK - der Gesellschaft für streitorientierte Kulturforschung ausgeführt, wo je zwei Künstler ihre Werke ausstellten und jede Woche das Werk des Verlierers mit einem neuen ausgetauscht wurde, bis es am Ende des Jahres einen Sieger gab. Eine Stimme konnte man mit dem Kauf eines Bieres hinterlassen. Andi hat da gegen Dominik Halmer verloren, weil Simon die Wahl gefälscht hat. Bei dieser Ausstellung ist es wichtig, dass Parteilichkeit vermieden wird und auf die wesentlichen Eigenschaften der Werke geachtet werde, wie Technik, Botschaft und Größe.

Da es ja ein richtiger Wahlkampf ist, ist die Stadt mit Wahlpostern zugeballert. Dadurch ist diese Aktion nicht auf den Ausstellungsraum begrenzt, sondern findet in der ganzen Stadt und den Herzen und Köpfen der Menschen, die diese bewohnen, statt. Niemand ist mehr unbeteiligt. Besucher können nicht mehr bloß Kunstfreunde sein, sondern halten plötzlich die Zukunft der beiden Künstler in ihrer Hand. Ganz zu schweigen von der Freundschaft mit den Beiden.

Jana Schröder at Natalia Hug

By Suzanne Mierzwak

Jana Schröder's large-format paintings are developed through a performative practice between conscious composition and deliberate coincidence. Abstract images are accumulations of signs that refer to the artist's personal gesture, unfolding into productive lives of their own.

A constant theme is the line. Whether being a trace of a movement, a hasty doodle, or a script-like tag, the line never depicts a world outside the image. It only expresses itself in a tautologi-cal manner. That ability is exactly the line's subversive potential: to capture the attention of the viewer in one moment, only to leave them longing for representation in the next.

In Schröder's series Kinkrustations, the lines transform into dense, living tissue where thick and thin veins follow the artist's hand gestures. They flow into one another and interweave, layer by layer, forming a textured, luscious surface. Looking closer, the scattered, light-blue areas reveal the original blue of the oil paint. The pastose way of painting coupled with the haptic structure place the materiality of the paint in the foreground. A dark substance that holds its own, breathes and ages like the viewer on the other side. Kinkrustations fulfils a process of continuously be-coming as the drying process never halts completely.

Kadlites form the second series of works. Glazed with lemon yellow acrylic paint, the images resemble oversized post-it notes that capture brief information and keep it from being forgotten. Schröder increases that information ad infinitum using graphite pencil and paint brush to make notes all over the surface. Mixing turpentine with lead powder, she creates dynamic lines which inscribe themselves into the canvas in the form of contemplative scribbling or frantic crossing out. In contrast, as if stroking the surface with a rubber, she removes certain parts of the exist-ing lines and, by doing so simultaneously adds more lines. Thus, this then multi-layered surface reverses the very meaning of erasement: the method of subtraction turns into the method of ad-dition.

Schröder's painting process is not so much that of singular authorship as it is a collaborative development. Her performative approach reminds of Gilles Deleuze's concept of a Desiring-Ma-chine. Being the main actor, she triggers a production process and initiates a movement, whose course she ultimately can't completely control and define. While she constantly has to position herself to match the material's movement, the material, in turn, becomes Schröder's accomplice.

Following this concept of interconnectedness, the exhibition is organized in two parts: Kink-rustations and Kadlites, the first part (Kadlites and Kinkrustations 1/2) flowing with the next (Kadlites and Kinkrustations 1/2), collaborating, coexisting.

The Subtle Language Of Process – Jana Schröder On Abstraction And Concept

By Lara Konrad

When Jana Schröder stands in front of a bare canvas and begins her gestural scribbles with copying pencils and oil paint, the formal rules of the act of painting are abandoned, yet not entirely forgotten. Monochromatic rivers of lines and curls leisurely percolate through, turning the aesthetic effects into an interactive space between artist and material. And, eventually, between artist and viewer. Unlike other traditional forms of painting where it often becomes about returning and staying within particular places of memory (our own, or those of others), the handwritten landscapes of Schröder emanate proximities of the present without wishing to retire elsewhere. Stark contrasts of overlapping colors — like yellow and shades of blue — cause an immediate recognition for whatever current reality. Our temporary alienation transforms into something warm and familiar, it's nice to have arrived somewhere that doesn't instantaneously encourage us to leave.

A former master student of Professor Albert Oehlen at Kunstakademie Düsseldorf, Schröder's artistic choices are about process, they don't ask to be intellectually-exaggerated into meaning just for the sake of being meaningful. The further analyzed, the more her work turns into a consciously-systematic reduction of interpretation where potential philosophical musings are eventually left to die. Somehow, though, this notion of absence doesn't conjure the concern of purposelessness. A new consciousness rises — empty and grand — it's about seeing what is, not what might be.

Collecteurs: You once said, "Art is contemporary, if it asks the right questions." What are some of the questions we should be asking ourselves today? Do you think these questions necessarily need answers or, for now, is it just important that they're being asked?

Jana Schröder: Throughout the process of Spontacts, I basically wanted to find out what scribbling is capable of. What happens with lines, what occurs in between two layers? What can be left behind? How can I accelerate, and how can I decelerate? When does the result come in, and what changes the outer circumstances? What does reproduction stand for? Is it good to lose control?

I'm finished with a series once I 'give my okay' and it leaves the studio. There are elements, of course, that influence the work after it leaves my side. From that moment on, it's a bit like having a Tamagotchi—it's up to the owner how, and if, they want to take care of it.

Collecteurs: The casual gestures on your canvases appear like automatic writing, a certain lack of control that directly asks the audience to see whatever they want to see. A little dangerous, since people are subconsciously more comfortable being told what to see and what to think. Is it your intention for your audience to get lost in their very own thoughts?

JS: I hope the viewer asks him or herself the same questions that I ask myself.

Collecteurs: If the audience doesn't ask the same questions, does it mean the work has failed? Or does it mean it has taken on a different meaning?

JS: I think someone who comes from a similar background to mine, is likely to think the same. If something goes totally wrong, then I guess it's the viewer's fault, not mine.

Collecteurs: The works are also done with copying pencil, which means they change in nature once they come into contact with UV light. Do you like the idea of your works altering over time, depending also on the shifts of mood that occur from one day to the next?

JS: I'm not such an emotional artist. The painting totally depends on its new owner. Either the works are taken care of or age over time, turning into something different. Both outcomes are fine by me.

Collecteurs: Your paintings seem to reveal an absence of control. Yet, there's order too. I wonder if it's possible to intentionally devise a lack of control, since obviously the intent itself poses a paradox. Is it important for you to lose control when submerged within the process of creating? What does it actually mean to lose control?

JS: I need to have control when working, to a certain extent at least. It's pretty quick to make curls with a copying pencil, but the painting itself needs to wait until I'm ready for the next step. The oil paint, for example, takes time to apply and, as that's a conscious decision in itself, the loss of control has clear limits.

Collecteurs: I guess that's the general order of life... control within chaos.

JS: Yes - exactly!

Collecteurs: The series Spontacts has been an ongoing project for several years now. It first began in 2011 or 2012; Canvases were covered in a million layers of blue that essentially seemed black to the viewer. Later on, you transitioned into lighter shades of blue and avoided the repetition of layers of paint. Why did you decide to continue working on this particular series, and not move on to a completely new series of works?

JS: Spontacts and Kinkrustations originated almost simultaneously; I was constantly working on both. They're a good match, especially since they allowed me to create order and chaos at the same time. I began a new series last year called Kadlites. They're not blue anymore, they're yellow. More things are happening on the canvas, elements are erased and added again. It's been great fun!

Collecteurs: There's an interesting link between Spontacts and Kinkrustations, especially now that I'm aware of their simultaneous origin. Being so different in their physical impact — Spontacts feels rather soft in comparison to the black immediacy of Kinkrustations— they seem to have functioned as two separate outlets during their process. What made both of these works so similar, yet also so distinct?

JS: The matter of speed is an important factor here. Kinkrustations require many different layers of color. They have to dry – or at least begin to dry. It's then followed by more color and oil. They're dirty bastards, really. Spontacts, on the other hand, are done much quicker and half as messy. If the copying pencil touches anything though, even if just slightly, everything ends up blue. Spontacts are easier to grasp for people, whereas Kinkrustations are really something for an expert. Both will change over time.

Collecteurs: The color blue previously took an elemental part in your work, however there's now a shift into yellow with the new series Kadlites. The singularity of color, however, remains.

JS: My works used to be very colorful before Spontacts. At some point I wanted to see if that same colorful chaos could also originate with one singular color. Since I also reduced other things, like the surface, the attention towards the line became much more significant. Blue is such an absurdly beautiful color, it's almost impossible to think otherwise.

Spontacts also has a series with magenta, which works great. Once I also bought green copying pencils, but they were too 'stiff.' Blue and magenta are really the only colors that work. Kinkrustation is mostly 'Prussian blue,' which is also a difficult color since just a tiny spot can make it seem like it's everywhere. If you add layer upon layer though, it looks good.

After all this mess I really wanted a neat studio. Due to the fact that during the Kadlites series surfaces were reduced, a yellow glaze worked best. It leaves enough pencil traces, yet it's still able to visually consume the white surface.

Collecteurs: By documenting such 'unreadable notes,' there's also a suggestion for thoughts to be deciphered. A divergence between the external versus the internal. Is it about a personal desire — a preposition — for humans to focus more on the internal instead of the external?

JS: For me, handwriting is purely about the aesthetic value.

Collecteurs: Alluding to words that are there, yet not entirely, I think your work also becomes subject to frustration, even if it goes nowhere.

JS:I hope the viewer doesn't get frustrated when they can't decipher a word. It's definitely not about "Haha, you can't read it!"

Collecteurs: Why then choose to scribble and not write clearly? What do you want to provoke by scribbling?

JS: Either you choose a legible phrase — which will always convey a message — or you strip a word's meaning. Both things work equally well, but I'm generally just interested in the aesthetics of handwriting. I want the viewer to feel ecstatic, in some way. The handwriting was also much more present in the first works and gradually evolved into scribbling.

Collecteurs: What originally prompted the inclusion of handwriting?

JS: It was the most direct way to start a picture and many letters are just very beautiful. For instance, 'f,' which directly from its under-curl flows into another 'f.' Repeating that 12 times creates a very elegant curl. The same goes for 'h.' Starting with 'Z,' 'x,' or 'X' is for professionals. A mirrored 'F' is also nice, but both strokes departing from the longitudinal line must be a little crooked. 'C' is a classic. It's impossible to mess it up, regardless of how it's positioned. An exaggerated 'e' also works. 'B' should just be left alone!

Collecteurs: What's wrong with a capitalized 'B?'

JS: It always looks funny. For example, it would just get in the way and put the viewer down after having laughed about it.

Collecteurs: Is handwriting ever about returning to the past?

JS: Handwriting can't be entirely unemotional. When seeing someone's handwriting, immediate connections to that very person arise. But since I only use my own handwriting, it's the other person who has to deal with it.

Collecteurs: Do you ever see yourself moving away from works like Spontacts, explore drawing beyond the scribble, maybe even explore a medium that's totally different?

JS: My new series Kadlites moves towards the idea of surface, leisurely getting rid of handwriting. I can't promise though an 'h' isn't going to appear somewhere!

A new medium though? I think I'm too much of a classic painter. My attempts at sculpture were always way too influenced by the 80's. I think I could have been a great actress.

Jana Schröder

By Marta Silvi

In her first solo show at this gallery, Jana Schröder proceeds nonchalantly through a strongly performative pictorial practice. Her large canvases appear like monuments of automatic writing — in this case, notes and doodles type one might imagine psychoanalysts encouraging patients to make in order to ga — in access to repressed exp of the memories. Schröder's activity is a tribute of sorts to the paintings of Albert Oehlen, the artist's professor at the Kunstakademie Düsseldorf from 2005 to 2009, who combined abstract and figurative elements in response to the neo ressionist aesthetic that reigned in the 1980s. "Spontacts Paintings," 2016, a series of large canvases executed in indelible pencil and oil, bring to mind the spontaneity and impulsiveness implicit in the title's portmanteau, belying the true nature of the operation. Schröder's camouflaged stratifications of paint that emerge upon close observation are more evident in works where grids and squares stabilize the background, creating a geometric platform and a circumscribed and pulsating space of action ( Spo ntacts Ro and Spontacts UD 07 ). The artist applies various layers of indelible pencil, subsequently reworking the subtle lines, or even completely expunging them with a slow, more concrete pictorial stroke. Meanwhile, her process is linked to the alchemical qualities intrinsic to the ink, which tends to gradually dissolve and/or change color when exposed to sunlight. This is painting in a state of constant evolution, which offers the viewer a form that is never definitive. Spontaneity versus control, surface versus depth, and apparent speed versus slowness of gesture are the ingredients of an investigation that is more complex than it appears.
